Global Sources supplier rankings

Suppliers are ranked using a 6-star ranking system. Companies with a higher star ranking provide more business information and verification reports on their Global Sources online homepages. Suppliers rated 5 or 6 stars have a Credit Check report from First Advantage or Sino-Trust and a Supplier Capability Assessment report provided by Bureau Veritas online. The rankings are correct at the time of publication and may be subject to change.

We offer unrivaled quality

Large cloisonné enamel car badge

Verified by Bureau Veritas, Sedex, Coca-Cola, NBC, Disney, McDonald’s, Universal and Walmart

Among China’s emblem manufacturers, the cloisonné technique has been gradually given up because of its complexity and high costs. But we care deeply about this craft process and keep developing it while retaining its traditional characteristics. Because cloisonné emblems are high quality and very durable, they are the best choice for military and outdoor car emblems.

We cooperated with the 2010 FIFA World Cup, 2012 Summer Olympics and 2014 Winter Olympics, and 2014 FIFA World Cup. And all of our products meet EN 71-3 and CPSIA standards. With four factories staffed by 5,000 workers, our monthly capacity is more than 10 million metal emblems, lanyards and embroidered and silicone/PVC products. To find out more, inquire today.

When a supplier cannot provide certificates

A “fake” certificate is often a real certificate that was issued regularly by an accredited testing laboratory and later “photoshopped” to show another product and/or supplier name.

Another popular method is that of obtaining a “real” certificate that does not correspond to actual tests (in other words, the result is always a “pass”). The most savvy China suppliers know the exact price for this service.

I guess 10 to 30 percent of the certificates given by China suppliers to their customers are fake.

So the question for the serious importer is: How to get a REAL and LEGITIMATE certificate, in case the supplier has not already obtained it?

If the supplier ACCEPTS to get it at their cost

As an importer, you are 100 percent responsible if the products are sold in your country, and are found dangerous and illegal. So I advise to micromanage this process if you have enough time:

- Give your supplier a few names of testing labs you “strongly prefer.” Avoid local China labs if possible.
- Ask to see the application before it is sent by your supplier to the lab. Make sure you get the report directly, at the same time as your supplier. This way, if the product fails the tests, you will know about it.

I realize that your relationship with the supplier might not be good enough to request what I suggest above. But it is certainly worth asking for!

If the supplier REFUSES to get it at their cost

I guess some purchasers who read this article will think,

– In preproduction, the manufacturer is supposed to pay for the certification of his product in case it is subject to regulations such as RoHS and CE.
– In production, the importer is supposed to pay and have samples from the batch to be tested. Suppliers often use good components for preproduction samples and cheap inputs for production. That is a huge source of risk.

“The factories I work with will never pay for it.” That is very probable, unfortunately.

And, if they do pay for it, are not they including that cost in the product unit price?

For these reasons, some very sophisticated importers pay for certificates and what they get in exchange is full control of the situation:

- They get to work with the laboratory they want.
- They receive reports and know when the result is failed.
- The report is issued in their company’s name and the supplier does not even get to see the report.

This last point is more important than it seems. It means the supplier cannot easily use the certificate to sell the same product to other customers.

Any other tips in this case?

Renaud Anjoran has been managing his quality assurance agency (Sofeast Ltd) since 2006. In addition, a passion for improving the way people work has pushed him to launch a consultancy to improve factories and a web application to manage the purchasing process. He writes advice for importers on qualityinspection.org.

Customer-led innovation, OBM advancing

In an interview with Global Sources, Ben Simpfindorfer, founder and managing director of Hong Kong-based market expansion consultancy Silk Road Associates, discusses the changing nature of China volume production, including the shift to own-brand manufacturing. He also talks about how the rising cost of domestic labor continues to be a major challenge for China suppliers and how this difficulty is not easily solved by pursuing less-expensive labor.

Simpfindorfer’s new book, “The Rise of The New East” (Palgrave 2014), examines how Asia’s commercial landscape is not simply growing, but also growing in complexity. Using a combination of high-level analysis and street-level anecdotes from Beijing to Bangkok to Mumbai, Simpfindorfer looks at a range of issues, including e-commerce, sourcing, entertainment, urbanization and China outbound investment.

Global Sources: How has the nature of volume production in China changed in the past several years?

Ben Simpfindorfer: The China story is still very much about volume. But customer-led innovation, as opposed to company-led, will be a crucial differentiator in the years ahead, especially in the electronics sector. And so manufacturers will need to be more nimble and closer to their final markets. That is good news for China in so far leading local companies are already evolving fast into consumer-led innovators. In fact, China electronics companies are arguably leading the world in many areas of consumer-led innovation. But the vast share of manufacturers will struggle to make the same change and so will be stuck in high-volume, but increasingly low-margin production.

GS: Are more suppliers “reinventing” themselves into own-brand manufacturers?

Simpfindorfer: China manufacturers have recognized that being a brand owner is a more profitable business model. Of course, that has always been true. But a number of developments have accelerated the change in attitudes. First, a greater range of foreign brands is being sold in China itself and so factory owners can more easily compare the retail price with the ex-factory gate price. And they obviously see a big difference. Second, manufacturers can more easily search online for foreign brands and make the same comparison. Third, rising costs and margins pressure have forced manufacturers to reconsider their business model to a greater extent than before. It is a perfect storm that has woken up many to opportunities.

Ben Simpfindorfer is founder and managing director of Hong Kong-based market expansion consultancy Silk Road Associates.

GS: What challenges do suppliers face as they shift from OEM to OBM? How do you think suppliers should address these challenges?

Simpfindorfer: Brand owners have an entirely different DNA from manufacturers—they know how to build brands, whereas manufacturers understand how to engineer products. So trying to do both can be like running two separate businesses. It is a challenge that many of the world’s biggest brand owners have already encountered and, in response, simply exited the manufacturing business entirely. It will be no different for China manufacturers wanting to become brand owners. But that is a big change and most will struggle to make the jump. How should they respond? Perhaps it is best to establish the brand business as an entirely different company operating under a different management structure and, most importantly, with a different DNA.

GS: Will China move away completely from OEM business? When? Why or why not?

Simpfindorfer: China will never move away entirely from the OEM business, partly because there is no other single country that can pick up the slack. Moreover, China’s competitive advantages, including its vertical supply chains, is reason to continue sourcing from the country. That said, I can see China factories increasingly producing OEM for domestic brand owners, as a new generation of China entrepreneurs with the right combination of design and marketing skills develop homegrown brands. And so “China for China,” rather than the world, will support a decent OEM business.

GS: What do you think would be most beneficial for China suppliers? OEM or OBM business and why?

Simpfendorfer: OBM business is more profitable, especially if producing for the local market where entrepreneurs have deeper insights into local tastes. But again, it is a tough step for most.

GS: Rising labor costs are acknowledged in the volume manufacturing/exporting industry as one of the biggest challenges facing China suppliers. Do you think solving this is as simple as running after cheaper labor?

Simpfendorfer: There is cheaper labor outside China, but not in sufficient scale and often in difficult to access countries. In fact, Asia’s youth population will decline in almost all countries over the next 15 years, so even the existing pool of youth labor will become more scarce even as demand for labor continues to grow. The only region where there will be a significant increase in youth labor is in Sub-Saharan Africa, but the region is not a simple substitute for China. And so manufacturers will have to become bigger and smarter. But there is room for improvement, and many of the global retailers and suppliers we speak with all believe China manufacturers can potentially make significant productivity gains, it is just that many are not sure how or where to start. They need help.

GS: Is it worthwhile for China manufacturers to invest in or relocate factories to other countries in Asia?

Simpfendorfer: China manufacturers should certainly look at their opportunities, but perhaps it is best to partner with a global retailer or sourcing company that can share their experiences and commit to firm orders.

For the others, there are still plenty of productivity gains that can be made at home and this approach might be the easier or safer option. It also offers greater flexibility, by introducing a culture of constant improvement, rather than simply chasing lower costs. But again, it is not an easy step and many are looking for help.

GS: What would you advise China manufacturers considering relocation?

Simpfendorfer: Relocation is not just about chasing lower costs, but changing the business model or tapping new markets. For instance, currency fluctuations or minimum wage increases can quickly overwhelm what might initially appear to be lower costs and so manufacturers need to be sure they have relocated for more strategic reasons that are not solely dependent on costs.

GS: Discuss briefly the concept of near-sourcing. Do you think this will be the future of volume buying or will China continue to be the primary source of imports?

Simpfendorfer: China will remain the world’s largest supplier, as there is no country that matches it for sheer scale. Sure, the country’s share of global supply is falling, or at least flattening, in many product lines. But that simply means global manufacturing is fragmenting across multiple countries and regions. Some of those countries offer the advantage of being near to a buyer’s home market, and so offer shorter delivery times and allow global retailers to make more efficient use of working capital. That is near-sourcing. It is not a substitute for sourcing from China, but instead offers an additional option, as buyers look to mix and match their global sourcing strategies.

GS: Aside from proximity to buyers, what advantages do near-sourcing hubs such as Eastern Europe, North Africa and Latin America have over China? What does China have over these hubs?

Simpfendorfer: These regions are also growing markets in their own right. Take the China white-goods manufacturer Hisense, which opened a factory in Cairo to sell not only to Europe but also to Africa. That fact that Egypt has a Free Trade Agreement with both Europe and Africa is a major cost advantage, at least relative to China. And if you are tailoring products for the local market, then being close to that market is key.

Producing in these hubs also diversifies the exposure of a manufacturer or global buyer to a trade war between China and Europe or the US, a risk that cannot be overlooked, especially with Europe still struggling to shake of the excesses of the global crisis.

GS: Do you think near-sourcing suits all types of buyer or just a specific type? What advice would you give China-centric buyers that are considering near-sourcing?

Simpfendorfer: Near-sourcing best suits those global retailers sourcing from multiple countries and regions. They are best positioned to mix and match their orders across the world, taking advantage of each country’s unique advantages, whether that is proximity to market, duty-free access or cheap labor.

GS: How should China suppliers and the country as a whole address near-sourcing?

Simpfendorfer: China manufacturers would benefit from exploring production possibilities in regions such as Latin America, Eastern Europe or North Africa. It is not only helpful in terms of near-sourcing, but also in terms of supplying those local markets, especially as local demand grows and in the event of rising trade protectionism. I would, however, expect that only China suppliers partnering with large global retailers will truly go abroad. The capital and time commitment is significant and so it is key for a manufacturer to feel confident that their supplier will sign long-term orders from the new factory and provide some assistance in terms of the initial set-up.

China IP protection is possible

Virtually every US company doing business in or with China has intellectual property requiring protection from China. Yet far too many of these companies treat IP in China as an optional or secondary matter when it really should be one of the first issues they consider when approaching the China market.

Let us first get clear what we mean by “intellectual property.” IP is not patents, trademarks or copyrights. These are simply tools for protecting IP.

So what is IP?

- A better term might be intangible property or intangible assets. This includes everything about your business that has value that cannot be reduced to a physical asset or to a monetary cash flow, with the exception of things such as goodwill or reputation.
- For creative industries, IP can include virtually all of the assets of the business:
 - Music
 - Film
 - Books and magazines
 - Research and analysis
 - Design of any kind: interior design, clothing design, product design
 - Architecture and engineering
 - Software of all kinds: industrial, retail, video games, mobile apps
- For traditional industrial firms, it includes:
 - Inventions
 - Formulas
 - Industrial processes and know how
- For all businesses, it includes:
 - Brand and image
 - Business planning and corporate strategy
 - Pricing plans

IP is a substantial portion of the value of most modern businesses. For many businesses, such as those in creative services, it forms the core of the value of the company.

Consider the stars of the modern business world: Apple, BMW, Microsoft, IBM, Boeing, Siemens, Nestle, General Electric, Dow Chemical, Starbucks, Amazon and SAP. Huge portions of their value is in their intangible assets.

However, even for hard asset, resource-based companies, IP is still a major component in their company value. Take the mining companies that have dealt with China for the past 10 years. A major portion of their value lies in their pricing plans, their internal data on their resources, their techniques of extraction and transport, their future exploitation plans and the like. This explains why the primary battle between these companies and their China competitors centers on the attempts of both sides to acquire data to aid in the struggle over control of the market.

Active and careful cultivation of intangible assets is mandatory to survive in the modern business world. There is much more to protecting intangible assets than the traditional IP tools.

The traditional intellectual property tools are:

- Patents
- Trademarks
- Copyrights
- Trade secrets

Though these tools are essential in the IP world, there is a far wider set of techniques that can be used, including the following:

- Secrecy and refusal to disclose
- Licensing and trade secrecy agreements
- Trade secrecy and related agreements with employees and joint venture partners
- Physical techniques such as encryption and related data protection techniques

Many companies believe that since they have done what is necessary to secure their rights in North America and Europe, there is nothing special they need to do in China. This is a mistake.

The key concept is that IP protection is local. Since all IP protection is based on local law and practice, you must adopt an effective and realistic protection program for the country in which you are operating. If you are in China, you must consider the situation in China. China is currently the most dangerous country in the world when it comes to protecting intangible assets, but that does not mean you can afford to throw up your hands and do nothing. China’s IP risks can be managed, if you realistically assess the risks and take practical steps for protection.

IP is a substantial portion of the value of most modern businesses. For many businesses such as those in creative services, it forms the core of the value of the company.

To protect your IP in China you must make use of the China system. You must act within China for creation of rights, enforcement of rights, and monetary exploitation of rights. You must deal with China the way it is, rather than hoping to rely on a perhaps more perfect system that simply does not exist in China.

China IP protection can be divided into the following four categories in terms of the effectiveness of the system of legal protection:

- Patent and trademark protections generally work well in China for protecting against large scale infringement, though small time infringement is difficult to prevent.
- Contractual measures such as trade secrecy agreements, non-disclosure agreements, licensing agreements, and technology transfer agreements work in China if — and only if — properly implemented.
- Software copyright. China has a specific regime for software protection by copyright. The system is shockingly effective for commercial software. The system has had limited success in protecting retail software.
- Copyright in creative works. Copyright protection in China has not worked well at protecting creative works in the retail sector. Virtually all movie, film and music products are cheaply available in China on a wide scale in pirated form. On the other hand, copyright is effective in China for specific violations of copyright in a business to business setting. However, effective protection of copyright requires careful attention to the China registration regulations. It does little good to rely on the general right of copyright for creative works.

Businesses must focus on the realistic risks within China. The risks vary depending on the type of intellectual property. The general situation is as follows.

1. If your IP has value and if it can be copied with minimal effort, it will be copied and you should prepare for this. The following assets are particularly susceptible to copying in China:
 - Trademarks, trade names and logos
 - Exterior product design (design patent and copyright)
 - Books, photos, reports, drawings/plans — any other medium that can be photocopied and reproduced
 - Any material that can be copied in digital form: music, film, CAD drawings
2. China companies seldom put much effort into independent copying of inventions and other technical IP that cannot be copied easily. If intangible assets cannot easily be copied, China companies will usually wait to be trained by the foreign business. They will seldom appropriate foreign technology on their own initiative. As a result, the motivation of many China companies that work with foreign businesses is to acquire technology, trade secrets and know-how via training from the owner of the IP. This occurs in virtually any area where China companies work with foreign businesses:
 - Technology licensing projects
 - Joint venture manufacturing or services
 - OEM manufacturing
 - Product design and development agreements
 - Employee training
 - Distribution and sales agreements

Most technology, know-how and trade secrets are lost in China to companies and employees that have been trained by the foreign owner of the intangible asset. Usually this loss could have been prevented with proper agreements and business practices.

No protection in China will be perfect and US companies often discover that their preferred and customary method of technology protection is not available in China:

- Patent protection is often not available because of the China rule requiring that China patents must be filed within one year of the patent having been filed elsewhere.
- Copyright protection is often not effective for easily copied digital media.

Faced with this, many US companies simply give up and operate in China with no protection at all. This virtually always leads to disaster in China. The correct approach is to work to find an alternative form of protection. This can be achieved in many ways, including the following:

- Licensing agreements
- Secrecy and non-use agreements
- Technical controls, such as encryption
- Direct manufacture rather than OEM or joint venture

Many US businesses think China has no IP laws and that China companies do not file lawsuits. This is a mistake. China companies actually tend to be quite adept at using the China IP system to their own benefit, including employing the following tactics:

- If the US side fails to register its IP in China, a China entity will register the IP in its own name. In this way, the China company cuts the US company out of the US company’s own market. This happens regularly with trademarks, patents and commercial copyrights.

- Many US companies mistakenly believe that China does not have a developed IP protection system. They, therefore, do not adequately investigate to ensure that they are not infringing the rights of others in their operations in China. This is especially of concern when the US company hires a China contractor to perform services or engages in cooperative design or manufacturing operations with a China company. The US company only learns later that it has infringed on the IP of another. The resulting damages can be significant.

There is IP protection in China and if you are going to be doing business in or with China, it behooves you to figure out how best to protect your intangible assets.
